these reasons, and forgetting the historical prowess of the Scythians, the ruin of Cyrus, the defeat of Darius, and the reproof of Alexander, this infatuated man led his host against the descendants, not yet degenerated, of the same brave Scythians, approached our territories, and dared to pass them. In taking so bold a step, his strength and his confidence were in the imminent of his forces, one half of which was equal to our whole army, or the most, appointed to oppose his entrance.* Against an enemy so powerful and so implacable, Russia had to rely entirely upon herself. She had recourse to extraordinary means and exertions, and the sacrifices she made are unexampled in the history of nations.

Frequent and painful experience has sufficiently demonstrated the incompetency of coalitions to attain the end proposed, and their consequences, often ruinous, and seldom beneficial, to the combined powers. Each

REFLECTIONS ON

It was natural to expect, that, notwithstanding the awful approach of war, the further effusion of human blood, already shed in such prodigious torrents, would be prevented by the timely peace with Turkey; an event totally unexpected by Napoleon, and highly creditable to the foresight and wisdom of the Russian government: but this pleasing hope soon vanished, and every friend of humanity who indulged it, found himself grievously disappointed, and cruelly deceived. This peace, as it disengaged the external forces of Russia, and enabled her to turn all her means to the sole object of home defence, increased the danger of persisting in a war with her: but so obvious a consideration, though founded on common sense, and calculated to determine any other man, had no weight whatever with the ruler of the French nation. He was a slave to other motives, which were repugnant to the dictates of prudence, sound judgment, and moderation. France was exhausted, (1) as well as her allies or the countries conquered by her: nothing therefore but the spoils of war could procure him the means of continuing it, and of reimbursing the enormous expenses which he incurred by his immense preparations. Some new exploit was likewise necessary to repair his disasters in Spain; (2) which he hoped to reconquer in Russia, well knowing that the fall of this last power would at once place the whole European continent at his mercy. Moreover, he dreaded the pungent satire of London journals; (3) and had not the courage, while all plausible pretext was wanting, to withdraw the troops which he collected between the Niemen and Vistula. of whom in ancient days the neighbouring nations thus expressed their awe: *Against God and great Novgorod who can stand? An attempt to conquer such a people, to enthrall the millions possessed of one loyal heart, and one daring soul, could only be the effect of rashness, of ungovernable fury, of madness, leading to a punishment at once certain and terrible, such as was actually inflicted.

Despondency belongs not to the character, and is unworthy of the name of a Russian. Taught by the splendid examples of his ancestors, he would rather cease to exist, than fear an invader, or mistrust his ability to defend his home: accordingly, all was confidence; and posterity will say—The Russian people in the days of Alexander were still themselves.

* This question was so often used, that it at length became proverbial among the foreigners who knew Novgorod by fame, or from personal intercourse. Note of the Editor.
